Ship Building in Delaware. -The wooden shipyards of the Delaware Peninsula are unusually active this season. Some of them which have been idle for several years are now resonant with the shipcarpenter's hammer and the caulker's mallet, while those who have continued their operations uninterruptedly present a greater quantity of work on hand. To a certain extent these wooden vessels are building for parties in the Eastern States. Years ago Delaware white oak was exported to Eastern markets for ship-building purposes, and it was no unusual sight to witness sometimes as many as half a dozen large coasting vessels lying at accessible points in the rivers taking on cargoes of this favorite timber with ship-builders. But this seems to have passed away now, and these vessels are seldom seen in the same waters. It seems to have been practically demonstrated that it is cheaper to build the vessels than to transport the lumber to other places, for the reason that the cost of living is much less here than in New England, and the cost of transportation in bulk not near so great. But we should judge, from the information we possess, that by far the greatest amount of vessels now in course of construction in these Peninsular yards is for our own trade. Commerce has wonderfully increased on the Peninsula since the war, and although our Peninsular railroads have established a sharp competition in the carrying trade, they seem to have only developed our commerce so much the more, and to have infused into it an activity hitherto unkuown. - Wilmington (Del.) Commercial.

NOT QUITE A WEDDING .- The Richmond State Journal, under the head of "a disappointed audience," gives the following account of a wedding which was not a wedding:

"Last night, about half-after nine, a large crowd assembled at the First African Baptist church, with the expectation of witnessing a marriage ceremony, but a far different scene was witnessed. The couple made their appearance and started up the aisle, when wife num-ber one arose and informed those around her that that man was her husband and that she had something to say about his marrying. The would-be-two-wifed man retreated in as good order as possible under the circumstances, with his intended on his arm, and the crowd, who seemed to be as highly entertained as if they had witnessed they ceremony, dispersed.'

This invention should be speedily in general use.
